Weather Forecasts Deemed Infallible by Arkansas Planters.

How to Interpret Its Predictions by Its Mottlings.

Mr. William Swift has an Arkansas goose bone which he prizes more than he would a complete set of Signal-Service reports, says the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. It is the breast lone of an Arkansas wild goose, and for weather forecasts it beats any barometer ever turned out of a factory. Mr. Swift showed it to a reporter and explained how the weather could be read by holding the bone between the eye and the light. Hold it with the keel down," he said. 'You notice that the low part is exactly like the keel of many of the ocean vesals, and that, sir, is what they took their models from. Now, when you hold it up to the light you can notice a number of mottled spots in it. Each one of those indicates a storm, and from its size and character you can tell what sort of a storm it is going to be. If the spot is dark it will be a severe storm, if light it will be a severe storm or a little bad.

will be simply a rainstorm or a little weather. "But how can you tell when they will occur?"
"Easy enough, my boy. You begin at the deep part, the pointed end of the keel: that is the 1st of December, and the first third (marked 1) is the space for the month of December. You can divide it into thirty-one days if you want to. The second third (marked 2) is for the month of January and the third (marked 3) is for February. "But how can you tell when they will of January and the third (marked 3) is for February.

"Now, if there is a dark spot near the end of the keel you may be sure there will be a big storm in the early part of December. Now look at the small end. Do you see how cloudy and dark it is? That's this cold spell we're having now, and it was foretold there in the goose bone three months ago." months ago, "
De you think that much reliance can never fail."

"But don't different goose bones dif-But don't different goose bones differ in their spots?"
Never. Den Able told me that he Bad shot as many as twenty gesse on the Arkansas River in one season; I know he has, because he used to be on one of our boats and he shot at least one goose on every trin, and he said that he had taken our all the breast kones and companed them and every one was motledalke. Oh, there's no doubt about the accuracy of the goose bones as a barometer and the Signal Office reports will verify them."
